- 1 This article is devoted to the Bukharan intellectual and man of letters Ahmad Donish [Aḥmad-e Dāneš] (1826/7-1897), who is commonly regarded as the leading figure in the Tajik Enlightenment. The "Introduction" on his life and works, with a few linguistic considerations concerning his writings in prose, is followed by an annotated translation in Italian of two sections of Donish's major, partly autobiographical, treatise: Navodir-ul-vaqoe' (Navāder al-vaqāye') [Rare Events]. The first translated section is an extract describing Donish's journey to Saint Petersburg during the winter of 1873 and his reflexions on the meaning and difficulties of traveling abroad. The second section, set in Bukhara, is an entertaining passage from the chapter "Dar Odobi nikoh va bayoni khosumati modarshū" ["Marriage ethics and elucidations on the inconvenience caused by the mother-in-law"]. Saint Petersburg and Bukhara are the main cities in the life of Ahmad Donish. The central Asian Persian Enlightenment was, in part, influenced by the Russian Enlightenment; it is evinced above all in Donish's prose-writings in which the history of the Bukhara Emirate is one of the major subjects.
